Lt. Gen. Joseph F. Carroll, USAF
Director
Defense Intelligence Agency
Washington, D. C.

Dear General Carroll:

During our recent telephone conversation, I indicated my concern about Rome Air Development Center action in response to a proposal submitted to them by [redacted] proposal to study the possible value of electronic stimulation of enemy defense nets was informally received by the Agency in September, and after consideration of various alternatives we decided that their participation would not be advisable. [redacted]

[redacted], was informed of our decision when he visited the Agency about 1 December. At my request Alan telephoned his people to determine if the proposed study had been submitted to other government organizations. It appeared that FTD, SAC, NORAD, and the Avionics at Wright Patterson AFB had been contacted, but that they had not shown any interest.

After returning to California [redacted] learned through further direct conversation with his people at [redacted] that Mr. Edward Munser, Rome Air Development Center, Griffiss Air Force Base, Rome, New York, had also received the proposal, appeared to be enthusiastic, and had responded by requesting a more explicit study proposal.

I would suggest informing [redacted] that the value of electronic stimulation (which [redacted] proposed to study) had been determined, required especially close control, and received your personal attention. You could then recommend that further effort in this area at RADC would duplicate other current efforts and should not be pursued further.
